Ministry

Cleft lip and cleft palate are birth defects that occur when a baby's lip or mouth don't form properly. In the earliest days of a baby's development in the womb, there is normally a split (called a cleft) between the right and left sides of the lip and the roof of the mouth (called the palate). Sometime during the 6th to 11th week of pregnancy, this split comes together to form the lips and mouth. If the tissue doesn't join, it can cause a cleft lip or a cleft palate.

Causes:

- Genes. A gene defect inherited from one or both parents prevents the lips and mouth from joining during development in the womb.
- Genetic syndromes. A genetic syndrome is a disease that has more than one symptom or defect. It can be caused by a single gene or many genes. Cleft lip or palate are found in more than 400 syndromes, including Waardenburg, Pierre Robin, and Down syndromes. Approximately 30 percent of cleft defects are associated with a genetic syndrome.
- Health and Environment. A mother's poor health in early pregnancy, or if she drinks alcohol, smokes cigarettes, or takes certain anti-epileptic medications may increase the risk for cleft lip or palate.
