Juvenile Arthritis

Juvenile Arthritis (JA), also known as pediatric rheumatic disease. It isn't a specific disease, but it's an umbrella term used to describe the inflammatory and rheumatic diseases that develop in children under the age of 16. Most kinds of JA are autoimmune or autoinflammatory diseases. That means the immune system, which is supposed to fight against foreign invaders like viruses and germs, gets confused and releases inflammatory chemicals that attack healthy cells and tissue. In most JA cases this causes joint inflammation, swelling, pain and tenderness, but some types of JA have few or no joint symptoms or only affect the skin and internal organs.

CAUSES:

- The exact causes of JA are unknown, but researchers believe that certain genes may cause JA when activated by a virus, bacteria or other external factors. There is no evidence that foods, toxins, allergies or lack of vitamins cause the disease.

SYMPTOMS:

- Joints look red or swollen and feel stiff, painful, tender and warm. This can cause difficulty moving or completing everyday tasks. Joint symptoms may worsen after waking up or staying in one position too long.
- Dryness, pain, redness, sensitivity to light and trouble seeing properly caused by uveitis (chronic eye inflammation).
- Skin symptoms may include a scaly red rash (psoriatic), light spotted pink rash (systemic), butterfly shaped rash across the bridge of the nose and cheeks (lupus) or thick, hardened patches of skin (scleroderma).
