Health Literacy

Definitions of Health Literacy:

- "Personal health literacy is the degree to which individuals have the ability to find, understand, and use information and services to inform health-related decisions and actions for themselves and others."
- "Organizational health literacy is the degree to which organizations equitably enable individuals to find, understand, and use information and services to inform health-related decisions and actions for themselves and others."

Limited Health Literacy Affects People's Health:

Limited health literacy has very real consequences for people's health. Compared to adults with adequate health literacy, adults with limited health literacy have:

- More serious medication errors.
- Higher rates of emergency room visits, hospitalizations, and death.
- Worse preventive care and health outcomes for their children.

Limited Health Literacy is a Health Equity Issue:

According to the NAAL assessment, people were more likely to have poor (Below Basic) health literacy skills if they:

• Self-reported poor health; Were age 65 or older; Had health insurance from Medicare or Medicaid or had no insurance; Lived below the poverty level; Were Hispanic or Black.
